

This Two-storey Singapore Apartment was Designed to Feel like a Japanese Ryokan

SARAH MORAN

Home Journal

Ripple Apartment

Sarah Moran
19.01.2023

With a focus on evoking the tranquility of water, Right Angle Studio was tasked with renovating this two-storey apartment to refresh its look. Originally trapped in a blocked and heated condition, the 1,550 square foot house has been redesigned to maximize airflow and light.

On entering, visitors and residents are greeted by a wooden corridor that turns out to be a portal hiding the kitchen and bedroom. There's an extended bar counter in the living room, which draws attention to the fluted details.

A customised sofa and lounge chair sit opposite each other, encouraging conversation. The dining area has a marble table and drop chairs that make the residence feel like a Japanese ryokan, with a sliding ash screen that also serves as an outdoor balcony divider.

The staircase was redesigned with a pocket bench and tailored handrail to maintain a harmonious visual relationship. Users are introduced to the space's defining moment through an artificial skylight: Lynda Laird's serene seascape canvas.

As you go upstairs, symmetry creates a surreal, mirrored effect, with a glass facade reminiscent of a hotel suite.

Full article –
<https://bit.ly/3GOdTvL>