For T Office, Right Angle Studio draws on the concept of a home office, illustrating a clean yet functional design for employees to enjoy.

It is well documented that over the course of the COVID-19 pandemic, a large number of office workers have gotten used to the comforts of remote work. While it has some benefits, such as time saved on commute and flexibility for workers, there are also pitfalls such as stifled communication.

When Right Angle Studio was engaged to design a family office's workplace, the client posed a particular challenge in response to this: to design an office that encourages staff to return to the office and resume a normal working pace similar to pre-pandemic times.

“After consulting with the staff, we decided on a design direction that will allow them to be engaged in a more casual environment to feel connected to the [office]. Beyond the apparent benefits of an aesthetically pleasing space, an office design that prioritises staff well-being is equally relevant in today's world,” says Account Director Jay Liu, who co-founded the Singapore-based firm with his brother Alex Liu who is the firm's Principal Designer.
