When Alex and Jay Liu established Right Angle Studio in 2011, the design duo had simplicity in mind. The Singapore-based studio, which often distills interiors down to fundamentals, suggests a purity of intent through its signature aesthetic. Their latest project, a duplex apartment referred to as The Residence, embodies this vision and marks an evolution in the studio's design process.

“Since The Residence was a self-commissioned space, this project allowed us to have complete liberty to explore and execute specific design elements, such as integrating solid wooden screens as safety grilles or utilizing the same screens with a frosted finish to replace the use of curtains or blinds,” shares Alex Liu. “This project is also a consolidation of all the past experiences and details we’ve tested, which have proven to work and last.”

The apartment, composed of zones that both invite connection and offer space to retreat, is organized around a platform staircase that includes a planter housing a flourishing tree.
