Following a most daring spatial transformation, this resale flat now features a 'green corridor' and calm, light-filled spaces that a couple and their pet rabbits can enjoy to the fullest.

In Singapore, we're witnessing a growing desire for homes that integrate nature and with that, a rise in innovative solutions for high-rise garden living.

Like many HDB flats, this modestly sized, four-room resale unit does not have a balcony that can be given to a garden. Yet, the designers from Right Angle Studio have resolved it a most beautiful way – one that sees a smooth assimilation of greenery within the home.

The young couple living here are nature and animal lovers. In their free time, they enjoy recreational diving to explore marine life and to reconnect with the outdoors. "The owners wanted a daring, open-plan design, with more space allocated to the communal areas where they intend to spend most of their time. They also requested a designated zone for plants and room for their rabbits to roam around," shares Jay Liu, Account Director of Right Angle Studio.

By transforming a three-bedroom unit into a one bedder, the designers have managed to enlarge the communal spaces, and ensure that they are open and seamlessly interconnected. A light and neutral colour palette also heightens the home's calm and airy atmosphere.
