With a clear divide between public and private areas and a strong design language, the Monolith apartment by Right Angle Studio strikes a balance between expressive material textures and muted, earthy colour palette.

With a liberal brief from a client to transform an old public housing flat into a contemporary apartment, Singapore-based Right Angle Studio (RAS) was given a challenge of creating a spacious, yet cosy and welcoming, abode with a clear delineation between social zones and private zones for relaxation. The firm's co-founders Alex and Jay Liu overhauled the old layout into two zones, with the living, dining, kitchen and bar areas belonging to the public zone and the walk-in lounge, wardrobe and master room contained in another zone, closed off as the homeowners' private space.
