Set within the leafy Thomson Hills Estate, this house by Right Angle Studio embraces the unique opportunities presented by its split-level topography. Designed for a family of four, Hill House transforms what was once a dark and fragmented property into a light-filled residence where movement, connection and everyday rituals unfold across a sequence of shifting elevations.

The project marks a continuation of a long-standing relationship between the homeowners and the studio. Having previously collaborated on the family's apartment, the homeowners returned to Right Angle Studio when they decided to move into a larger home better suited to their growing family. Located near the Central Catchment Nature Reserve, the property also carries personal significance, as the homeowner grew up in the area and was drawn back by a sense of familiarity and connection.
