Tucked within a residential pocket near the Singapore River, this 1,500-square-foot apartment has been carefully shaped into a calm yet characterful home for a young family of four. Designed by Alex and Jay Liu of Right Angle Studio, the residence reflects a nuanced take on contemporary urban living – one that balances architectural clarity with warmth, tactility, and everyday ease.

The homeowners, a pair of entrepreneurs with a grounded outlook on life, travel frequently and hold a particular affinity for Japan. This appreciation for calm, considered environments influenced the tone of the home, which was envisioned as a place to unwind, gather, and grow with their children. While the family enjoys hosting friends, they were clear that the space should feel relaxed and lived-in rather than overly curated.

From the outset, the designers focused on shaping how the home is experienced as one continuous, flowing space. The main living zone is gently defined by two slanted fins positioned at either end of the apartment, subtly guiding movement and sightlines through the interior.
