Tea Room

When it comes to showcasing collectibles in a home, most do it in a haphazard manner – finding any available space to display their prized objects or corralling them all on open shelving units without much thought in a prominent area.

But few let their passion drive the design of their homes—becoming a dominant theme even. A fitting example is this HDB flat belonging to an avid tea connoisseur and collector. Aptly named Tea Room, it has been meticulously designed by Alex Liu and Jay Liu of Right Angle Studio to honour the fine and gentle art of tea drinking.

“The idea was to conceptualise the living and dining zones as a private room to showcase the owner’s collection of teaware, which are exquisitely curated over her years of travels across East-Asia,” the designers share of their concept.

To create the well-tailored linear structure that is the continuous portal, the master bedroom which originally protruded into the dining room had to be taken in a tad bit. “By squaring off the living and dining areas, it results in a more ordered layout,” says Alex of this small yet impactful spatial transformation.

In terms of materiality, wood elements are heavily used throughout the flat for their intrinsically calm and natural qualities. Yet when examined closely, the woodgrains and colour tones of the flooring are markedly different from the furniture and built-ins, much like the delicate beauty of the colouring of tea.
