Welcome to Singapore apartment The Residence, a spacious, Zen-like interior by Right Angle Studio.

By their own admission, designers and architects creating their own homes can sometimes be their own worst clients, plagued, as they are, by over-design and hamstrung by hyper-self-criticism and second-guessing.

Happily, none of these drawbacks is evident in this Zen-like cocoon – a spacious 1,570 sq. ft. duplex Singapore apartment in the Bishan neighbourhood in the outskirts of the city centre – conceived by Alex Liu of local Right Angle Studio.

The exterior of the relatively nondescript apartment block gives little hint of the disciplined serenity of the three-bedroom, three-bathroom interiors that feature an artful mix of Scandinavian and Japanese touchstones.
